

I feel strongly that if Sinclair Broadcasting airs an anti-John Kerry documentary, the station must adhere to current FCC rules and provide equal time to those who have different agendas. I am not a strong Kerry supporter but I am a believer/defender/protector of the first amendment.

I don't understand what is happening to "equal time" and other FCC regulations. It appears these rules are "selectively" enforced and favor groups, companies and media who hold and project conservative political beliefs.

By not providing equal time for pro-Kerry and anti-Bush supporters, Sinclair Broadcasting is CLEARLY in violation of FCC regulations which i find most disturbing. The media is supposed to remain objective, regardless of the personal views held by the owners, board of directors and shareholders. And if the company is unwilling to abide by these rules it is then the FCC's job to enforce them.

Such unapolgetic tactics by media companies like Sinclair and the absence of any censure by the FCC is what I consider truly un-American behavior: protection of SOME, not all.
